Matthew 25:1-13

In the Name of the God whose coming we await. Amen.

Today is the first of what I think of as the Waiting Sundays. This is the 3rd Sunday before the liturgical year begins again. The Scriptures we hear through the end of this month will tell of the End Times, culminating in Matthew's vision of Jesus separating the sheep and the goats.

Advent, when it comes, will gift us with its own kind of waiting, keeping the baby Jesus in the wings until the very last minute – something different from the world around us.

This parish family knows a lot about waiting. During the roller coaster of COVID, we waited and waited, and then waited some more, for things to get back to normal.

How do you react when you're forced to cool your heels? Perhaps at a traffic light that never seems to change. Or when you hear, "The doctor will be right in." "Your table should be ready in 20 minutes." "Your call is very important to us." How do we react? Teeth grind. Blood pressure rises. Watches are checked. Managers are summoned. None of us likes to wait. We live in a world of the immediate. Whatever it is that we want, we want it now.

But the Christian story, our Christian story, is filled with waiting – especially waiting for Jesus to come again. Almost from the beginning, the Church has wrestled with how to understand sayings of Jesus like, truly I tell you, there are some standing here who will not taste death before they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom (Mt. 16:8).

In writing to the Thessalonians, St. Paul clearly thought it possible that Jesus would come again in his lifetime. For this we declare to you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive, who are left until the coming of the Lord, will by no means precede those who have died (1 Thess. 4:15).

Over the centuries, countless folks have scrutinized the Scriptures, trying to figure out when, how, and to whom, Jesus was coming. Many specific dates for the Second Coming have been predicted (and passed),¹ despite Jesus' own warning that no one knows of that day and hour, not even the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but my Father only (Mt. 24:36). In the past month, I have read about some evangelical Christians who believe that the current war in the Middle East will accelerate the Second Coming.

Now, we may tut-tut at such folks, but let's remember that every Sunday, in the Nicene Creed, we affirm our belief that Jesus will come again in glory to judge the living and the dead, and that his kingdom will have no end.

So, without further waiting, let's turn to today's gospel. I confess that I have a deep love for the story Matthew tells today. And it was quite a shock in the last several weeks to discover that among my scripture study colleagues in Connecticut, Tennessee, and here in Muncie, I seem to be alone in that affection. What, I thought, is wrong with these people?

A little reflection on this question led me to the music of J.S. Bach's Cantata 140, Wachet auf (Wake, awake) which he wrote in 1731 to illuminate the very gospel story we hear this morning.² Each time I hear this music, everything in me glows with joy. There's no gloom of shut doors here. In the fourth movement, Bach lays down a riff that has you on tiptoe, leaning forward in anticipation. (Demonstrate ritornello from movement 4, Zion hört die Wächter singen.) This is why I love this story.

But it is clear that this story of wise and foolish wedding attendants is difficult for many to hear. Perhaps it is difficult for you, as well.

Here are some of the things I've heard. The story doesn't make any sense because the wedding customs of Jesus' time are nothing like our own. Why did the wedding attendants have to bring their own lamps to the party? The "wise" attendants seem selfish, and the door shutting feels means. Why is the groom delayed? And, by the way, where the heck is the bride?

I haven't found a single, simple interpretation that addresses these rough edges. But one of the characteristics of a parable is that it allows us to turn it over and over in our fingers as if it's a diamond, seeing what different facets reveal, even if there are contradictions.³

So, let's begin with some questions about one of those facets. Do you believe that there will be a wedding feast someday? Do you recall the last time you heard someone preach on the Second Coming? When's the last time you thought, "Goodness me! What if today is the day that God's reign comes in all its fullness? What if today is the day that God restores our broken earth, ushering in the new creation?"

We've seen that the church has always had some anxiety about Jesus' return. Where was he? How long, O Lord? Many of us have grown accustomed, maybe even indifferent to his absence. In spite of what we say in the Creeds, we don't really believe he's going to return. After all, that "parting of the clouds" stuff is a little embarrassing, isn't it?

Embarrassing it might be, but letting go of a belief in the Second Coming presents two problems. First, as we've heard, Jesus said that he would return. So there's that.

Second, the coming of God's reign with all its fullness of healing and justice-making is the gold standard against which all of our own healing and justice-making, or lack thereof, will be measured. The wedding banquet is our standard, our ideal. Without it we have no accountability, nothing to lean into as we labor in God's name.

Another facet of the parable is this. There is going to be a wedding feast, but it's not going to go the way you think. In the parable, the attendants have to wait so long for the groom's arrival that they fall asleep. They all fall asleep. I can't imagine any of them expected the delay or would have chosen to wait that long.

Those we call "wise" heeded the Scouting motto to "Be Prepared," and brought extra oil against the possibility of the unexpected. They are adaptable when a delay causes a change of plans.

I can imagine the other five making some calculations before they left home. "I have X amount of oil, which will be plenty. I've been to scads of these things; I know exactly what to expect." How do they deal with a bridegroom whose notions of time, faithfulness, and celebration differ from theirs?

Here's another facet. Sometimes, doors close; do what is needful now. Lots of people hate that the five foolish attendants have the door closed on them. But like it or not, doors do close, chances do fade, time does run out. And the opportunity to mend the friendship, or forgive the debt, or heal the wound — closes down.

We like to tell ourselves that there's still time left. But what if there isn't? What if this parable is telling us to be alert now, to be awake now? To live as if each day is all we have? Not to presume that tomorrow belongs to you.

Still another facet. You are more valuable than your oil supply, so stick around. As I read the story, the mistake the five "foolish" attendants make is that they leave. Maybe they think their oil supply is more important to the groom than their presence at his party. By leaving, they deprive themselves of a wonderful celebration, and they deprive the bridegroom of their presence and companionship.

This is a mistake I understand. I know how hard it is to stick around when my “light” is fading, much less when I’m burned out, and don’t feel presentable. I get what it’s like to scramble to be perfect, to get all my ducks in a row, to get right with God, before showing up anywhere. Just think how much oil all that burns up.

What if we could believe that the groom delights in our presence – in all its flickering, imperfect messiness? Perhaps one of the lessons of this parable is this: don’t allow your fear or your sense of inadequacy to keep you away from the party.

And if, for whatever reason you do leave, I want you to hold on to this hope. You will be invited to the next party, because God is always inviting. This time, maybe you’ll be more intentional about going, Maybe you’ll bring more oil; maybe you’ll put the address in your phone. I don’t believe the door shutting is about people going to hell. I do, however, believe it’s a warning. If you don’t want to miss something, you need to show up...and then trust that God, who is light, will do God’s part.⁴

That thought allows me to wait, on tiptoes, with joy. (Bach music again.) Amen.
